Modern industry depends upon raw materials which are found at, or near, the earth's surface.
These raw materials are the product of past geological ages; for the most part they are not being reproduced by my natural process. The elements were built up long ago by a process which we are just beginning to understand, and which when understood may enable clever men to put an end to the human race. The process by which the elements were built up required enormous heat, the sort of heat that exists in the interior of the sun.
Questions:
(i)	What is the nature of the raw materials used by modern industry?
(ii)	Which sort of heat did the process require?
